LOS ANGELES — Taking the witness stand in a Chinatown shoot-out case, a Los Angeles police officer confidently testified how he administered the Miranda rights warning in Chinese to the defendant, Thong Huynh

The defense attorney, Michael Yamaki, countered by calling Mr. Huynh's court-appointed interpreter to the stand. The interpreter, Kenng Wong, testified that the warning on self-incrimination had been recited in the Toishan dialect. Yet Mr. Huynh had responded in Cantonese, which is essentially a different language. As a result, the Los Angeles Municipal Court judge, Samuel Mayerson, ruled that Mr. Huynh's confession-al statement was inadmissible as evidence during last month's pretiminary hearing stemming from the killing of a police officer, Duane Johnson. Although Judge Mayerson ordered Mr. Huynh to stand trial based on other evidence, his ruling spotlighted the expanding role of foreign languages in Los

As Los Angeles County becomes ever more multi-Egypt's Coptic Christians, who are lingual — the Spanish-speaking population doubled estimated to total five million to six and the Asian population nearly tripled from 1970 to 1980 — its courts have become a veritable United Nations of criminal defendants.

Court-appointed interpreters now are available in Afghan, Albanian, Arabic, Tagalog and Turkish — 80 languages in all. This is apparently more than in any other U.S. county court system.

Among their ranks are actresses, interior decorators, chemists, law students and housewives. The job, interpreters say, is rewarding and weighty, one that in some cases can mean the difference between conviction and acquittal.

But the increasing role of interpreters has been accompanied by questions concerning both the quantity and quality of their work. For example, Mr. Harris said, officials have difficulty locating enough interpreters on short notice in cases involving "exoue" languages — court slang for any foreign language other than Spanish. The problem exists in part because the county's

Now, the roster is 425 strong, including 200 for preters and that each defendant in a case has the right to his own interpreter.

If defendants must share their interpreters with witnesses, an appellate court reasoned, the defendants could not communicate with their attorneys, a constitotional right, without interrupting the proceedings.

Consequently, courtrooms are sometimes packed with interpreters. In one recent case involving Filipinos in the Superior Court in suburban Torrance, Mr. Harris said, six Tagalog interpreters were needed at once. "That pretty much exhausted our list," he said.

For 15 years, a written test for Spanish-speaking

That occasionally has allowed problems to arise. A current case that illustrates the range of problems faced in the profession is that of Japanese-born Fumiko Kimura, from Los Angeles, who was charged with murder after having waded into Santa Monica Bay clutching her young son and infant daughter in an apparent suicide attempt. At Mrs. Kimura's preliminary hearing, testimony was postponed for six hours because of difficulties finding a second linguist. As it turned out, both interpreters assigned to the case were Japanese of Korean heritage, and relatives and a Santa Monica police officer of Japanese heritage questioned the accuracy of their translations. Later, the interpreters themselves differed over the Japanese word for sanity. Eventually, one interpreter suggested that the judge find an interpreter of Japa-

Particularly when the officer was questioned about the manner in which he administered a Miranda rights warning to Mrs. Kimura. The issue became clouded when courtroom observers questioned whether the interpreter was translating the

The U.S. secretary of state, George P. Shultz, specifically cited the "French political scene" as an explanation for Mr. Mitterrand's intransigence. Another U.S. official speculated that global talks about agricultural subsidies in early 1986 could have provided ammunition to the French opposition in the middle of an election cam-

French officials were caught off guard by the swiftness with which Chancellor Helmut Kohl of West Germany agreed to support the U.S. position on starting negotiations early next year under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, or GATT. Mr. Regan said, "They were not satisfied with our course of conduct, but it was something we felt we had to do."

Mr. Shultz did not respond directly to a question about whether he had argued against opposing the sanctions, but another administra-tion official said that "the secretary's reservations about sanctions are well known."

The sanctions impose a total embargo on trade, suspend U.S. landing rights for Nicaraguan planes and ships and terminate a U.S. treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation with Nicaragua.

The West German foreign minister, Hans-Dietrich Genscher, said that the four European participants in the seven-nation economic conference do not believe that trade sanctions are effective. The four are West Germany, Britain, France and Italy.

"It is well known that European states do not tend toward embargo measures in any form," Mr.

Unless you've really walked in the shoes you don't know what you're talking about. It's theory instead of experience. And we don't have enough people in the Congress, I'm convinced, who have suffered those tough years in the world of business to really realistically know."

Mr. Laxalt added, to pro-longed applanse, "With all due deference to my former profession of law, we could stand a few less lawyers in Congress and far more business people."

So far there is no great cause for optimism. The Western democracies have repeated the stereotype practiced during three Soviet successions in three years. When the succession went to two old men it was claimed that advanced age means caution. Now that a younger man has taken over, his commitment to ressive and conciliatory ideas is taken for granted. As for the Soviet leadership, its response has been equally stereotyped, if less psychiatrically inclined. It has put forward essentially the same cliches and the same old threats since the funeral of Brezhnev. Nevertheless, common sense would suggest that the Soviet leadership must sooner or later undertake a eappraisal of its ossified foreign policy, not because its leaders have become particularly more peaceful but because circumstances would seem to require it. But how far that reappraisal will be carried depends importantly on Western attitudes. Among the most worrisome of those is the Western on with basing hopes for peace on the personal ity of the Soviet leader or on a personal relationship established at the summit. These hopes correspond to no Soviet reality. No general secretary, Stalin included, achieved unchallenged control in less than four years. Nor can a Soviet leader base a change of policy on so un-Marxist a consideration as his personal relationship with an American president without discrediting himself with his colleagues. The Soviet leadership is much more likely to consider the Western emphasis on the demeanor and dress of the Soviet leaders as a weakness that constitutes a strategic

HE best prospect for easing East-West tensions I resides not in the unknown attitudes of Mr. Gorbachev but in the crisis of the Soviet governmental and economic structure.

But these very domestic preoccupations will make the Soviet leadership as eager for a respite as it will be reluctant to add major foreign policy changes. Their temptation must be to purchase that respite by a nge of tone without real substance, a tendency to doubt reinforced by the sudden obsession with summit meetings by a conservative American

In short, wise Western statesmanship should seek to turn Soviet temptations for an atmospheric interlude into a durable change.

It is essential to convey two major themes: 1) that a relaxation of tensions must include a political compo-

For too long the Western democracies have flinched from facing the fundamental cause of tensions: the ground rules the Soviets have succeeded in imposing on the international system. Everything that has become Communist remains forever inviolate. Everything that is non-Communist is open to change, by pressure, by subversion, by guerrilla action, if necessary by terror. These ground rules, if not resisted, will inexorably shift the balance of power against the

The democracies have been reluctant to link political conduct and the control of arms because they are afraid to jeopardize their paramount objective of controlling the arms race. wars" concept. The first idea is not on the agenda of ous dialogue. Geneva. The latter idea is under systematic attack: by traditional theorists of arms control theory committed to assured civilian destruction, by allies eager to remove anything that the Soviets have declared an obstacle to arms control, and by Soviet propaganda whose strategy of intimidation is served by a military policy based on apocalyptic civilian damage. The convergence of these forces has managed to stigmatize strategic defense as "destabilizing" and as an obstacle to arms control before negotiations even have started. The Reagan administration has retreated before this onslaught. It has put forward at least four versions of strategic defense; it has justified strategic defense by invoking, in the language of the peace movement, its horror of nuclear war - on which, after all, deterrence theory will have to be based for the next decade whatever the fate of star wars. The administration has in rogue states like Libya, the Soviet military presence argued that star wars amounts to no more than rein Cuba, South Yemen and Vietnam, the intelligence search, leaving judgments as to feasibility and deploy-support for guerrilla movements, all produce internament for a period long after President Reagan's terms tional tensions - and dangers of miscalculation - end greater than the arms race as such.

RMS control, however important, is not a substi-A tute for foreign policy. Moreover, it would be nearly impossible to find a subject less suitable for a meeting of minds between heads of adversary governments after an interruption of the dialogue for more than six years. The subject has become so esoteric that it fits the description a British prime minister, Lord Palmerston, gave of the Schleswig-Holstein question of the 19th century: Only three people had ever understood it, he said. One was dead. The second was in a lunatic asylum. He was the third, and he had forgotten it. Arms control positions do not reflect an overall concept because they emerge from bureaucratic controversies and because there is no longer any intellectual theory outside of government to sustain them. Heads of state cannot cut through this fog in a single meeting: Their lack of sophistication on the subject may make matters worse.

So long as arsenals are based on multiple warheads, or MIRVs, and defense is proscribed, no foreseeable me of arms control will reduce either side's capac-

N this manner the Reagan administration may have always been permitted and has been carried out for a decade by both sides; indeed, the Reagan administration's budget is only about $8 billion more than that proposed by President Jimmy Carter. The emphasis on research has fostered the illusion that the European allies support strategic defense. In fact they "support" research partly as a platform from which to oppose deployment. Obviously, the Western tendency is, for domestic political reasons, to settle for whatever the Soviet Union has defined as attainable. It is therefore possible to foresee an outcome at Geneva that will reduce offensive weapons without impairing the capacity for civilian devastation, while it the deployment of defensive weapons is deferred to an administration that is bound to face much greater political pressures than the incumbent. And there is always the risk that the Congress, in the name of arms control, will emasculate strategic defense as it has the MX missile and thus saddle the United States with the worst aspect of every course of action.

The United States thus must chart a delicate course major lost opportunity. with a precipice on each side: Excessive truculence

Though I would have favored a less impetuous approach to the summit, a Reagan-Gorbachev meeting could enable the United States to convey the scope and requirements of a genuine easing of tensions provided the president is prepared to be precise. The principal message from Mr. Reagan to Mr. Gorbachev should go something like this:

"Present political trends sooner or later risk a confrontation perhaps not sought by either side, through eruptions neither can control. Existing ground rules are both unacceptable and dangerous. The avoidance of a political dialogue risks reproducing the conditions that led to World War 1: an accumulation of political tensions, one of which gets out of hand because no one has thought of how to contain it. No one would benefit from such a war except the regions spared its cataclysmic devastation.

There must be specific agreements that define the true vital interests of each side and the permissible challenges to them. In the past such agreements have been confined to generalities that created an illusion of progress. Let us now work on a concrete and definite program." And:

"As for arms control, the current tendency is either to confirm existing weapons programs or reduce them cosmetically. You have also used the talks to seek to deny us the use of technologies in which we are ahead and which reduce your ability for nuclear blackmail. You must know that we will not be driven off a defensive deployment designed to reduce civilian casualties. But we are prepared to keep our deployment to the minimum compatible with dealing with the tempted ever fiercer Soviet pressures. Research has offensive threat. Thus you have it in your power to reduce the level of defensive forces by drastic mutual cuts in offensive forces. In order to take account of your expressed concern that strategic defense might lead to a surprise attack, we are proposing that both sides abolish multiple warheads over a period of 10 years while we are phasing in strategic defense.

"Let us set up a private channel out of the glare of publicity to define what kind of world we want 10 to 5 years from now, both in the political and military field. As we make progress in this channel and through our foreign secretaries, we can meet periodically to review their work and issue instructions on the basis of Such a message would confront the Politburo with its real choice. If the approach is rejected we will know that any relaxation is certain to be temporary. If it is accepted it may lead to a breakthrough.

In either case, tensions will ease for a while. But we should not settle for an interlude. It would be a great pity if history were to record the present period as a

3 Cities Are in Running For Repeat Chess Match The Associated Press

TUNIS - The executive council of the International Chess Federation will meet in Tunis on May 13 to designate the site for the world chess championship match in September between Anatoli Karpov and Gary Kasparov, according to an informed source.

Tunis is playing host to a 17-round international chess tournament that began April 27. The Karpov-Kasparov match was suspended in Moscow in February. Moscow, London and Marseille are

The Falcon 900 demonstrates leadership quaitles in every important respect. First, it offers an extraordinary level of passenger comfort. All passengers who flew in it are unanimous to praise the quietness and comfort amenities of a very large cabin (2.34 m wide over 10 m long and l.87 m headroom). The Falcon 900 is a Leader in performance, too. With an effective range of 7,000 km (carrying 8 passengers and NBAA IFR reserves), it can easily fly from Paris to New York, from London to Abu Dhabi, from Tokyo to Jakarta. And the Falcon 900 can climb directly to 39,000 ft which puts it above international commercial air traffic. The Falcon 900 can cruise at up to Mach .85 (904 km/h) and has been flown at 94% of the speed of sound in test flights.

The Falcon 900 is also the Leader in efficiency. For long range operation, take-off weight is 20 tons, 10 tons less than its closest competitor under the same conditions and with the same payload. Thanks to its latest-generation Garrett engines, its excellent aerodynamics and lighter weight, the Falcon 900's fuel consumption is record-breakingly low: some 1/3 less than the above competitor, whose engine consumes almost as much fuel when idling on the runway as that of the Falcon 900 when cruising at Mach.80.

These figures highlight the sophisticated aerodynamic design of the Falcon 900, utilizing Dassault computer technology developed for the famous Mirage flighters – an experience that's unique among producers of business jets.

The Falcon 900 also scores first for safety. In the unlikely event that one engine should fail, the remaining two can easily supply the requisite thrust and maintain operation of the aircraft's critical systems. This level of security obviously cannot be matched by twin-jet aircraft, either now or in the future, whatever the developments in international regulations.

A Gamble at the Summit

inspecting the economic thought underlying the summit at Bonn. For behind the photography and the diplomatic chess, important decisions were made.

They were highly conservative decisions, because the participants were conservative: Even François Mitterrand of France and Italy's Bettino Craxi are currently to the right on economics. More surprising may be the fact that the seven economic conservatives in search of a recovery took a big gamble on how the global economy works. The problem was to find a strategy to reduce unemployment and ease tensions on trade and currency at a time when the American boom seems to be weakening but when it is uncertain that the other rich countries are going to take up the reins. In the end, the summit members called on Europe to fulfill its expansionary task by making its labor and capital markets more flexible -- removing the rigidities that discourage initiative and foster inflation. And they encouraged Japan to validate Yasuhiro Nakasone's promises to open up its markets to imports. What is uncertain is whether this exemplary, but hardly original, wisdom will prove sufficient, however vigorously it is pursued.

Can simple deregulation of the European economy, and general lubrication of its joints, produce an upturn without some modest dosage of old-fashioned expansionary fiscal and monetary policy? The summit's theory is that it will, because it will favor potential business profits and thus encourage capital spending. Skeptics dismiss this as belief in the powers of selflevitation: First, they say, you must raise actual profits, and that requires direct stimu-

The revelvy now is ended. But it is worth lus to demand. Such a stimulus, in turn, is dismissed by the opposing skeptics as pumppriming - inflationary by definition.

Evidence that greater flexibility can yield early growth even in the absence of accompanying action to strengthen demand either on the budgetary or monetary side — is rather scant. The United States would probably not have achieved its own recent recovery if its steps to free up the economy had not been accompanied by a boost from the budget. Can Europe do it differently?

For Japan, the question is similar. In a slow-growing world; can trade liberalization make a real dent in the Japanese trade surplus without some flanking measures to raise demand inside that country? Or will less strong demand for Japanese goods abroad and more competition at home simply make Japan's producers switch their sales efforts to their own domestic market? Again, the evidence of history is not all on the side of the optimists.

The roots of modern economic conservatism -- virtually refusing to grant budgetary and monetary authorities the discretion to adjust their policies in response to inflation, employment and investment rates - are well-known and understandable. Discretion has been abused in the past, and fine-tuning (a foolish concept) has produced hideous discords. But can one, confidently, throw out all such discretionary power?

The coming year will show whether the conservatism, and optimism, of Bonn were justified. If the gamble does not work, the seven governments will lose votes, because their electorates will have lost even more jobs than they have lost up to now.

An Alternative to Sanctions

In South Africa the confrontation over apartheid sharpens, and in the United States a feeling grows that Americans are doing too little for justice in South Africa and may even be comforting injustice. This is what is behind the rising impatience with the Reagan administration's policy of "constructive engagement" and, specifically, the countering campaign to legislate economic sanctions against South Africa. What is the right thing to do?

Above all else, the United States must speak in its true voice. Too often constructive engagement has amounted to a formula for pulling punches and making excuses for apartheid. While paying lip service to black dignity, U.S. policy has conveyed a sense that blacks are too impalient, and that whites are right to resist the black majority's demands.

The burden should not be on blacks to show they deserve the rights they claim, but on whites to stop denying equal rights to all South Africans, Strong governments like the one in Pretoria bend chiefly to inexorable internal demands, which are mounting.
In current circumstances, blacks are setting the pace of protest, and foreigners can do little to spare them the harsh, immediate consequences - death, arrest, or firing, But outsiders can assert constantly and sharply, the standards South Africa ought to meet in response. Apartheid is an outrage, and neither the United States believes otherwise. Sanc- cans, who care deeply for foreign approval, tions express outrage, but that is at once their will pay more attention, and the challenge to principal value and their principal deficiency. American policy at home will recede.

Easy slogans to the effect that Western investment and trade "finance apartheid" conceal the hard truth that sanctions would likely slow the engine of change that is the South African economy (or put companies in the hands of foreigners untroubled by apartheid), expose black jobholders to direct loss, push white South Africa further toward an embattled self-reliance and punish South Africa's dependent black neighbors.

The fallback argument, that sanctions, though of dubious economic effect, would have a considerable political shock value, stops working once the sanctions move from the threatened to the real.

Americans should not let themselves be distracted by a debate on this second-order issue. The first order needs an unbhurred focus: the steps whites should promptly undertake to end apartheid. The recourse to violence must go. The indecencies of discrimination must go. The pass laws and the group areas act, instruments for white control of black labor, must go. The homelands structure, robbing blacks of their South African nationality, must go. The denial of black political rights must go.
In short, the alternative to sanctions need nothing. It is targeting apartheid. Let the administration become as practiced in promoting the tasks of dismantling this odious system as it is in arguing against sancand two things will not be "constructive engagement," or doing

The Embargo on Nicaragua

The rejection of direct military aid to the Nicaraguan rebels has had the immediate salutary effect of forcing choices on the adminis-tration which have been available all along. We just stop buying their coffee and bananas. Washington is now moving decisively to isolate Nicaragua economically, which makes a lot more sense than trying to overthrow the Sandinist regime through indirect and covert military action. At least this approach eliminates the contradiction of making war with a country with which we maintain diplomatic and trade relations. So it is not surprising that this straightforward approach has won a good deal of swift support in a Congress which has been reluctant to start down the military road.

The approach is, of course, not without its problems for the administration, which has steadfastly resisted the use of embargoes. Yes, there is an inconsistency in the fact that we sell wheat to the Soviets, who in turn may now supply the sustenance for Nicaragua to make up for our deprivation.

But Managua is a long way from Moscow, and moving tons of cargo is a lot more difficult than making a state visit, as the head of Nicaragua did in gaudy fashion this week.

We are confident that the new measures will be, in the long run, more effective than those of the past, not only in Nicaragua but in all of Central America as well.

- The Baltimore Evening Sun.

It is difficult to see President Reagan's move as anything other than an ill-conceived move taken out of pique following the failure of his attempt to persuade Congress to vote $14 million in "humanitarian" assistance to the [Nicaraguan] rebel forces. This is flailing, foaming stuff, and illogical to boot.

HAVANA—The big news from Havana this spring is Cuba's rapid emergence from a quarter of a century of political and diplomatic isolation in Latin America.

The United States, which had worked for years to keep the Cubans isolated, now finds itself increasingly alienated in the hemisphere because Latin Americans are convinced that the Reagan White House does not care about their awasome economic crisis and that Fidel Castro does.

In historical terms, the shift in Latin American attitudes toward President Castro is vastly more important than, say, the Reagan administration's defeat in Congress over funding of the Nicara-guan "contras." One has the impression that the administration does not even remotely under stand the dangerous long-range threat to U.S. influence in the region.

Consider the following events, occurring in the month of April alone:

· Ecuador's right-of-center president, León Febres Cordero Rivadeneira, became the first elected Latin American chief of state to visit Cuba since Mr. Castro assumed power more than 26 years ago (Mexican presidents have paid visits, but the Mexican political system is not an example of representative democracy). The crucial result was a public agreement that ideological differences must not stand in the way of a new Latin American unity.

• Colombia's foreign minister, Augusto Ramirez Ocampo, flew to Havana to deliver a letter from President Belisario Betancur, a conservative, and to discuss the Nicaraguan situation with him. The Nicaraguan president, Daniel Ortega Saavedra, was here secretly at the time. Colombia, still fighting leftist guerrillas at home, maintains no active diplomatic relations with Cuba. but Mr. Castro and Mr. Betancur frequently consult by telephone. Mr. Betancur is known to believe that Cuba must become directly involved in the diplomatic process involving the Conta-dora countries — Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela — seeking a Central American accommodation. Mr. Castro has publicly stated his willingness to do so, but the United States opposes it on the debatable grounds that the Cubans are to blame for all of the explosive ills of Central America.

• Within a week of the inauguration of Julio Maria Sanguinetti as Uruguay's first elected president after two decades of dictatorial military rule, the new government canceled its ban on trade relations with Cuba. Uruguay plans to restore diplomatic ties as well, and a Cuban trade unssion already is in Montevideo.

• Since Raul Alfonsin was elected Argentina's first democratic president in eight years, Cuban-Argentine relations have been greatly strength-ened: Trade is very active, and Argentina is By Tad Szulc providing Cuba with export credits. Recently, Cuba's most popular singer, Silvio Rodriguez, took Buenos Aires by storm — a visit with

Elsewhere as well, the climate of acceptance of Cuba is growing, not as a function of pro-social-ist sympathies but of the spreading sense that Latin America must look after its own fate. To be sure, Mr. Castro has most artfully en couraged this sentiment, and his stance in his frequent pronouncements on the great economic crisis is that of the Latin elder statesman. But there is no question that when Mr. Castro speaks, Latin Americans listen. His declaration in an interview with the Mexican newspaper Excelsion in March that the Latin American foreign debt (it now stands at about $360 billion) simply cannot be paid and must be canceled by the banks, most of them in the United States, created wide comment throughout the region — com-ment that the Cubans kept alive by adroit public relations. Mr. Castro's argument that the debts must be settled through government-to-govern-ment negotiations, and that in effect Latin American debtors ought to unite in something of a debt cartel found a sympathetic audience.

Naturally, the Castro ideas are repugnant to the Reagan administration (and presumably to the banks), but the rub is that U.S. policy-makers have not comprehended the evolution of the debt issue from a financial into an emotional and political one in Latin America.

With an exquisite sense of timing, Mr. Castro seized the Latin American debt issue to lay claim to "fraternal" political leadership in the region, where many governments remain reluctant to speak out too harshly against the International speak out too harshly against the International Monetary Fund, the private banks and the Reagan administration. And the Reagan administration further helped the Castro crusade when the Treasury secretary, James A. Baker 3d, failed to mention the question, except in passing, at a recent meeting of the IMF's governing interim committee. This omission was instantly noticed throughout Latin America.

Cubs's hemispheric standing is improving steadily because of the worsening social and economic situation in most of the countries and the perception that the United States is neglecting them — and not even benignly. Bolivia al-ready is working closely with Cuba. Peru has indicated a desire to do so. In Brazil, with the largest debt in the world (nearly $110 billion), the Chamber of Deputies Foreign Affairs Commit-tee has voted for resumption of diplomatic rela-tions with Cuba, and both sides are interested in the potential for trade.

Clearly, economics are not the only reason for Latin American resentment against the United States under the Reagan administration and the Cubans' success in turning the trend to their advantage. The United States's "secret war" against Nicaragua has antagonized much of Latin American public opinion, which fears a U.S. military intervention.

Cuba's new influence in Latin America should not, of course, be exaggerated, and Mr. Castro himself is extremely careful not to push too hard. He prefers to have the Latin Americans themselves decide that they wish to accept him among their political brethren, rather than embarrass them by urging contacts. Nonetheless, there is a clear consensus among foreign diplomats in Ha-vana, including the Latin Americans, that a sig-nificant change already has occurred in Cuba's relations with the rest of the hemisphere.

The extraordinary fact is that the U.S. government is blissfully unaware of what is happening. Presumably, the Reaganites' ideological obsession with Cuba and Nicaragua has blinded the administration to other dimensions of the Latin American reality. The absurd fear of Cuba (something that, for example, Henry A. Kissinger did not experience, seeking instead an accom-modation) has paralyzed whatever creative instincts existed in the U.S. bureaucracy,

Projecting U.S. Force in The Mideast

By John C. Ausland

OSLO - Driving south of Tampa, Florida, you may chance upon MacDill Air Force Base. Not far inside the entrance is a large concrete building that looks like a warehouse. In it are 800 people preparing for what could be America's next war.

These men and women work for the U.S. Central Command, established in 1983 to replace the Rapid Deployment Force. The command's uninformative name is symptomatic of the ambiguities it faces. Although General Robert C. Kingston, the commander, is responsible for the conduct of any U.S. military operation in the area from Egypt to Paki-sian, no government in that region is prepared to provide him a home. The formation of the Central Command is an important symbol of the change that has taken place in the U.S. attitude toward the Middle East. and particularly toward the use of force in the Guif area.

This is illustrated by a policy puideline statement that the State Department sent to the Pentagon in 1969. At that time, the British were withdrawing from the Gulf region and looking to the United States to play a larger role.

Since the United States was eneaged in a war in Vietnam, it had little military power to devote to a Gulf contingency. Therefore, said the State Department directive, "The U.S. will meet the threat of expanded Soviet influence by various means, but primarily by helping to encour-age the forces of independence and modernization in the countries of the region itself." This meant, above all, Saudi Arabia and Iran.

All this changed after the revolution in Iran and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Alarmed at the threat to oil fields around the Gulf, President Jimmy Carter in 1980 made his now famous commitment to use force if necessary to defend U.S. interests in that region. The problem was that the Pentagon had little capability to de-ploy ground forces and land-based air forces to the Gulf area.

In developing such forces, the first question that had to be answered was what contingencies U.S. forces must be able to meet. In public, emphasis was placed on an alleged Soviet threat to the Gulf; the public emphasis now is on a possible Soviet-supported takeover by Iranian communists when the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini dies. But a more likely use of U.S. forces is thought to be the defense of one of the many fragile regimes in the Gulf area.

The Central Command has at its disposal nearly six army and marine divisions, more than 500 air force lighters and bombers, three navy carrier battle groups, and one surface action group (based on a battleship).

The difficult question is how these forces would get to their destination and how they would be sustained. The challenges include these: • Getting the forces to the Gulf area. Although the Pentagon is increasing its sea and airlift capabilities, it would take weeks, even months, to get substantial ground forces to the Gulf. The Pentagon's answer is to preposition equipment and supplies in the area: this ambitions program is far from complete.

Obtaining the use of bases for aircraft en route to the Gulf. The Pentagon experience in gaining the use of North Atlantic Treaty Organization bases in connection with airlifts to Israel is not encouraging, it reflects a general reluctance by other NATO members to grant the use of facilities in connection with problems in non-NATO countries. Thus, the use of facilities on the Azores could be crucial in a Gulf crisis, but it is be crucial in a Gulf crisis, but it is uncertain that Portugal, a NATO member, would cooperate. The Pentagon is trying to develop alternate bases in Africa, including Morocco.

Obtaining the use of bases in the Gulf area. The Pentagon is spending large sums to develop bases in the Indian Ocean area. Key is the base on the island of Diego Garcia. But while the island of Diego Garcia. But while it is useful as a logistical base, it is thousands of miles from the Gulf. More useful as an operational base would be the Omani island of Masirah, on which a huge amount of U.S.-financed construction activity is under way. Other bases are being developed in Kenya, Somalia and Egypt, as well as in eastern Turkey.

Training and equipping American forces to fight in the Gulf area. The combination of mountains and desert poses serious operational problems. The Central Command is trying to provide suitable equipment for its forces, but this takes time. It is also conducting exercises in its area of responsibility and in the United States, in alternate years. Another "Bright Star" exercise, like the one in 1983 involving Egypt, Sudan, Soma-lia and Oman, is due this fall.

There appears to be growing skep-ticism in Congress about the Gulf commitment now that some of the larger bills are starting to come in. It may be a bit late to think about this. International Herald Tribune.

China and Japan: How They Buried Centuries of Hate

B EIJING — Four decades ago, China and Japan were concluding the most brutal war in the history of their rivalry, a conflict in which Mao Zedong exhorted his troops to "fight the enemy to the last drop of our blood."

But last month, a ranking Chinese official on a trip to Japan spoke casually of this war and Japan's 1937-45 occupation of China as "just a mo-ment" in the history of relations between the two countries.

The official, Peng Zhen, a member of the Politburo of the Communist Party of China and chairman of the National People's Congress, said China and Japan now have the "best relations in more than 100 years."

That is no exaggeration. The two old rivals have become the best of friends. As a Western diplomat put it. China has the best relations with Japan of any major nation, and Japan has the greatest access of any foreign country to China." Consider the following:

• In political terms, no other country enjoys the sort of entree the Japanese have to high-ranking Chinese officials. Diplomats from other countries speak with open envy of the ease with which Japanese diplomats and visiting officials get in to see China's top leaders, including Deng Xiaoping and the Communist Party secretary, · Economically, Japan is China's main trading partner. Japanese companies are selling so many television sets and other consumer goods in China that the old mercantile dream of reaping the wealth of the China market no longer seems fantastic.

 Culturally, the two countries are drawing closer. Last year, 350,000 Japanese tourists visited China, far more than from any other country and about a third of the total.

 Over the last year, China and Japan have even taken steps toward military cooperation. High-ranking defense officials of the two countries have begun to visit each other and to make "inspection tours" of each other's troops. Harno Natsume, a Japa-nese vice minister of defense, will visit China this month to talk with Chinese military leaders about "strategy, the military situation in Asia and the Soviet military build-up in the Far East," a Japanese statement said.

All this is little short of amazing in All this is little snort or amazing in the light of history. Over the last 400 years, China and Japan have gone to war three times. Mr. Deng has also shown favoritism toward the Japanese. In Decem-ber, after Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Britain signed an agreement transferring the crown colony of Hong Kong to Chinese sovereignty n 1997, she announced proudly that Chinese officials had agreed to receive a British trade delegation.

But when the mission of 10 top British industrialists arrived in February, they found that their trip coincided with a visit by 100 members of the Japanese Chamber of Commerce. The Japanese had an audience with Mr. Deng; the British did not. In economic terms, Japan's high-level contacts are paying off. Last year China's trade with Japan increased by more than 30 percent, to about $13 billion. Japan has now corworld trade. China's trade with the United States was about $6 billion. Economic competitors in the Unit-ed States and Western Europe are at a disadvantage because of Japan's proximity to China. And Japan's emerging economic rivals in East Asia, South Korea and Taiwan, have no diplomatic relations with China. And that leaves Japan in an almost unassailable position in the China market, at a time when a growing number of people in this country of a billion people are beginning to spend money on consumer goods.

Revisionist Remembrances: Enough!

WASHINGTON — What with one thing (the 10th anniver-sary of the fall of Saigon) and another (the 40th anniversary of V-E Day), you probably did not even raise a glass on April 19, the day in 1775 that the American Revolution began, or heave a sigh on April 24, the day in 1945 when the first United Nations conference opened in San Francisco.

Thanks to a calendar published by Foreign Policy magazine, I can tell you of other memories buried under the avalanche of preaching and pronouncements on what was morally wrong, pragmatically right or strategically inevitable about Vietnam and World War II.

Lyndon Johnson landed marines in the Dominican Republic on April 28, 20 years ago. A German U-boat sank the Lusitania on May 7, 70 years ago. On May 10, 1775, Ethan Allen's Green Mountain Boys captured Fort Ticonderoga.

Why am I telling you this? Be-cause enough is enough. The point is not that we shouldn't stop, look, listen and learn from World War II and Vietnam. The point is that you can overdose on revisionist remembrance, aimless remorse and political game-playing with imagery and symbolism. Better simply to com-memorate without claiming a corner on morality than piously to ren-der categorical judgment or exploit an anniversary to further policy.

Consider the overwhelming votes by the U.S. House and Senate regis-tering disapproval of President Reagan's visit to the Bitburg ceme-tery. Congress made no effort to state just how America should com-memorate the end of World War II in Europe. It simply bowed to a public outcry against the way the president was going to do it. Ironi-cally, West Germany's chancellor, Helmut Kohl, who had a lot to do with getting Mr. Reagan into the too, needlessly raised issues.

But he also spoke of the need for "reconciliation with the survi-vors and descendants of the victims" of the Holocaust. This "is only possible if we accept our histo-ry as it really was [and] if we Ger-mans acknowledge our shame and our historical responsibility," he said. The war in Europe ended 40 years ago this week with the capitulation of Nazi Germany.

In West Germany the anniversary has been preceded by one of the longest and most intensive public debates ever conducted in the country about the nature of German history, what it means and how contemporary Germans should remember it and cope with it.

The International Herald Tribune asked four distinguished Germans

— two politicians and two historians — to state their views on these issues.

All four are intellectuals who have published widely on scholarly and political subjects. Two of them are associated with the government of Chancellor Helmut Kohl and two are opposed to it.

Alois Mertes, 63, is minister of state in the Foreign Ministry and a longtime diplomat. A Christian Democrat, he represents the district that includes Bitburg in West Germany's Bundestag.

Peter Glotz, 46, is secretarygeneral of the Social Democratic party and one of the most prominent spokesmen for the opposition.

Hans Mommsen, 54, also a Social

Democrat, is professor of modern European history at Ruhr University in Bochum.

Michael Stürmer, 46, is professor of modern history at the University of Erlangen and a frequent adviser to Mr. Kohl. He also writes a column of political comment for the conservative Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, one of West Germany's leading daily newspapers.

Dealing with mixed feelings and uncertainty

By Michael Stürmer

HERE remained the drama's center-piece — blitzed Berlin." This is how Malcolm Muggeridge, then a member of British intelligence, remembered 1945. He continued: "Was all this, I asked thyself, the realization of our war aims? ... Had Berlin, in being reduced to rubble, become a citadel of democracy? Or were there, as before, just victors and vanished the state of the state quished, with some uncertainty as to which was which, and justice once more a fugitive?"

When Hitler killed himself on April 30, 1945, one of the great tyrannies of world history came to its end. May 8 was the logical conclusion of total war. Resigning in 1938, Generaloberst Beck, the German chief of staff, predicted what would happen. Subsequently, he tried to rescue the country by overthrowing Hitler on July 20, 1944. Beck's noble endeavor ended in his execution. With him many, hundred officers, diplomats, priests and trade union leaders paid the ultimate price. They had risen against tyranny but also against total defeat and utter de-

Any German who lived through May 8, 1945, surely remembers the day. I was 6 years old, my little rucksack packed for fleeing westward if the Russians came. Rather than be liberated by the Russians, my mother wanted to be conquered by the Americans. Her hope, once U.S. troops had arrived, was that they were there to stay. The worst was over, I was told: the firebombing, the fear, the nightmare of war. I remember the sunshine of May 8, almost too brilliant to serve as a

I also remember the first black American. irrespective of his "no fraternization" order, tossing a chocolate bar over to a little boy. He was followed by American Quakers who, after two years, filled my empty belly and gave me, for the first time in my life, the feeling of plenty. The war generation has in its guts the lessons of history.

While unconditional surrender had reduced the Germans to a mere object role and Germany to a geographic concept, the perennial question had already begun to divide Stalin, Truman and Rossevit. Who would control Germany? If Stalin gave the answer, V-E Day would lead to Bolshevik triumph. And where would 80 million Germans find their identity? If communism was the sole answer, the West would be lost. The key role of Central Europe for the world balance tossed an unexpected chance to the Germans. Those who happened to be in the West picked it up under the careful guidance of Adenauer.

In 1945 the grand old man of liberal German history, Friedrich Meinecke, wrote a book, "The German Catastrophe," weighing all of German history against the Nazi past, unable to decide which side the scales came down on. "A break with all previous history," his anthropologist colleague Alfred Weber called his own book of 1948. He was referring to the collapse of tradition and the need for a new moral frame. This uncertainty still is visited upon children and grandchildren, and today, it seems, more so than in the postwar decades.

Why is there so much soul-searching to-day? The Russians, through a new revanchist campaign, aim at blackmailing the Germans, creating distrust in the West and making Westpolitik more difficult for East Germany. But that is not all, nor is it the measiness of many neighbors watching the inner-German dialogue. A change of generation has taken place, the unspoken assumptions of the post-war years are under debate, the small print is being studied, and there also is a deep controversy about the meaning of history and its message for the future.

The majority of today's Germans were born after 1945. Innocent, in many parts of Germany, of any coherent and detailed knowledge of history and its meaning for past, present and future, many take freedom, security and prosperity for granted without asking the price. Rebelling against reality is a privilege of any young generation. Explaining, with patience and firmness, why the world is as it is, is the responsibility of any

History does not grant leave of absence to any nation for any length of time, least of all to those who have the fortune and the misfortime to dwell in the heart of continental Europe. Within the European dynamism that set the stage for the Thirty Years' War of our century, Germany and the Germans have --to make the understatement of the century - more than a proportional share of responsibility.

The present state of divided Europe, with the East Europeans held captive by the Soviet empire and the West Europeans largely de-pendent on the United States' continued defense effort and enlightened self-interest, owes much to the rebellions against history and geography emanating from Germany. We owe it to our neighbors to define and continue our role in the Alliance and to come to grips with our past. Otherwise this country may well become impredictable.

Filling money bags and looking for ever more welfare will not suffice in the long run. The outside world poses the perennial German question: Who controls Germany? And, where do the Germans find their identity? If one day the answer were not given in terms of Western political culture and a firm commitment to human dignity and liberal democra-cy, the lessons of history would be lost —and the money bags and the welfare checks would

HE 8th of May recalls a day of reckoning and a day of immense relief. Oblivio perpetua et amnestia was what the peacemakers of 1648 conceded each other when they closed the horrors of the Thirty Years' War, that seminal catastrophe of modern Germany. In 1945, Germans in the West were fortunate to find victors whose generosity and enlightened egotism led them to allow the survivors of the Third Reich and the vanquished of the war to become the citizens of the Federal Republic of Germany. Germans in the east were less privileged. To this day they have not ceased to lose the war. Victor's justice is still dispensed to them.

Altogether, the 8th of May is not only a date for Germans to reflect upon past, present and future. It also offers an opportunity for the West to ask who really won the Second World War. There is a variety of answers. One would be that the two tyrants who had unleashed the fury of war in 1939 triumphed in 1945, each in his own way: Hitler in methodology, Stalin in power and territory. The West, having won the Western part of war, lost the Eastern half of peace. Why should the Germans deny themselves mixed feelings? And why, by the way, should our

A distant event, unforgettable consequences

By Hans Mommsen

THE majority of Germans today are too young to remember the events of World War II. Most of the traces of Allied bombings have disappeared from the cities, and in the countryside, ioo, the physical scars left by the battles of that spring 40 years ago have vanished. Some of the bunkers and artillery positions from that time of disaster have been painted in bright colors or are being used as furniture stores. They are silent witnesses of an almost orgotten past.

Few Germans today go to military ceme-teries. Most of the German soldiers killed in the war are buried outside Germany. Since there are no special war monuments for the Second World War, the names of the casualties have often been added to the memorials of the First World War, and when one looks at these one suddenly realizes how many Germans were killed in Hitler's war of annihilation against the Slavs and the Jews.

Most of the members of the older generation do not like to talk about their experiences in the war, and those who do talk reveal only selected facets of the truth. Even that part of the horror that cuts into their ordinary lives is being repressed by them.

The Germany of today is a product of the longest period of peace — or of absence of war — since the 18th century.

The average German remains aware of the consequences of the war - of what happened after the defeat of 1945. But the war itself has become a distant, almost mythical event.

Almost no one in Germany regarded May 8. 1945, as an appropriate day for collective recollection until the D-Day celebrations in Normandy and other ceremonies by François Mitterrand, Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher made it imperative that the Germans, too, mark the occasion.

May 8, 1945, marked the start of a new epoch that enabled the Germans, at least in the Western part of their country, to emerge as a normal democratic society.

Only for a few did it really mean liberation.

Those who had been active in the pre-Nazi political left tried to set up anti-tascist committees that were promptly dissolved by the occupation powers.

What emerged was a general feeling of deep psychological and moral emptiness and collective national exhaustion, which in turn led most Germans to refuse political commitments. There was simply no prospect for future achievements. The need for simple survival predominated in a situation in which, for the first time, the Germans were confronted with hunger and poverty, while their state had disappeared and all forms of public authority were gone.

For these reasons, the Germans readily accepted the rule of the occupation powers and they did not oppose de-Nazification by the Allies — a process that was not carried out thoroughly because of the impact of the Cold War

The Hitler myth had provided the Germans with a father figure that replaced all other forms of national identification. With the death of Hitler, the German sense of national loyalty faded, and for a couple of years, particularistic tendencies replaced the nation-state tradition. There was nothing but a vague assumption that some time in the distant future it might become possible to undo the division of Germany, which cast its first shadow in 1946 when the Allied Control Council closed the border for refugees from the Soviet zone.

National indifference thus became the mood in the early postwar Germany. Today, the government of Helmut Kohl and Hans-Dietrich Genscher tries to recreate a sense of national consciousness in West Germany. But these attempts are led mainly by a generation of politicians who have been out of power since the late '60s. Reminiscences of the Bismarckian nation-state that are propagated by former German nationalists and by a recently re-emerging group of neo-conservative intellectuals and politicians close to Mr. Kohl, such as Alfred Dregger, the bead of the Christian Democrats in the Bundestag, do not coincide with the self-perception of the majority of the West German people, especially the younger gen-eration for whom the traditional nation-state and the boundaries of 1937 have lost all their Reunification is an abstract and almost empty formula because the overwhelming majority of Germans are well aware that the German question is not "open" and that the Eastern borders will never be changed with-out war. And war is rejected by all. The celebrations of the 40th anniversary of the end of the war will show that the majority of West Germans are ready to accept the bitter implications of the loss of the Eastern regions to Poland and the creation of two separate German states.

HERE exists a strong feeling of cultural solidarity between both Germanys, as distinct from political solidarity within a clear-cut German nationalism. A certain binationalization is emerging, more on the Western than on the Eastern side of the Iron Curtain, even though official terminology prevents West German speakers from calling the Federal Republic, which defines its identity along Western models, a nation of

To this extent, the lesson of the Second World War has been understood and the anniversary will corroborate this, in soite of some national or even nationalistic undertones by political groups who cannot desist from using nationalist consciousness for domestic political purposes.

The recent efforts by the government of Mr. Kohl to restore the national tradition by establishing the Museum for German History in Berlin and the House of History in Bonn appear to be nothing but futile attempts to reactivate the German nation-state tradition, which the overwhelming majority of German youth believe was finally destroyed on the battlefields of the Second World War. Young Germans in their overwhelming majority also support the improvement of relations between the two Germanys, but they do so not to return to the nationalistic tradition of the 19th century, but to achieve political normalcy and overcome the burden left behind by the prejudices and errors of Germany's particular past.

They implicitly reject the periodically remerging notion of Germany's mission as a bridge between East and West. Instead, having lost their illusions, they realize that any attempt to restore this tradition would turn Germany into the central battlefield of a third world war. Preventing such a war is among the highest objectives of any responsible political commitment in Germany today.

Facing unpleasant truths — all of them

By Peter Glotz

TE Germans must not grant ourselves a dispensation on May 8 to at back and simply say a little ▼ prayer. On a day when a great deal will be spoken on this subject everywhere in the world, we Germans must not remain silent. Nor must we remain silent about our own suilt.

Above all, we must tell no lies on that day. For example, it is a palliative and a lie to refer to May 8, 1945, as the day of our "collapse." We must bear in mind that this was the day when the remnants of the former Webrnacht surrendered unconditionally to the Allies. In his final army communique of May 9, 1945, Hitler's successor, Dönitz, spoke of the Wehrmacht having "honorably succumbed to a huge superior force." This was probably the feeling among most of the German survivors, but it was a false impression. The Germans had decided, despite the resistance of a small and terribly decimated minority of Hitler opponents, on a course of action that finally aroused the "buge superior force"

Hence, May 8 does not mark the defeat of all Germans; it was not a defeat for those who fought in or outside Germany against Hitler and who suffered or died in his prisons and concentration camps. But for us others, May 8 is a day of defeat. And it would be cowardly and undignified to shrug it off.

But May 8, 1945, also is the day when we were liberated from the yoke of Nazi dictatorship. I know how difficult it is for the German conservatives to accept this word liberation." They prefer to speak in romantic circumlocation of "Germany's darkest hour," and also take offense at the use of the term "liberation" by the Communists, too. However, this linguistic strategy is doomed to The state of the s AY 8 is hardly a suitable "festive day" for Germans, because it evokes memories of so many people who lost their lives. But we must admit: We Germans were not strong enough to free ourselves, without the help of others, from Hitler and his supporters. Others had to open the gates of the concentration camps for us. There seems no point in suppressing this

But it would be equally wrong for the Germans to remain silent on May 8 about the fact that most of them believe that the air raid on Dresden, crowded with refugee women and children, at a late stage of the war when it could no longer decisively influence the Al-lies' victory, was a horrible act of retaliation.

By the same token, the expulsion of the Germans from East Prussia and Bohemia was marked by terrible atrocities. Egon Kogon, an uncompromising opponent of Hitler who spent many years in the Buchenwald concen-tration camp, wrote the following words in "A nation which has seen the tharred remains of its women and children everywhere in the bombed cities could not be shaken by the piles of naked bodies put on display during the final days of the concentration

Perhaps we must try to make up for this at this late stage; however, we must not avoid any topic — including the mention of Dresden or the reminders of the expulsion.

The most important thing in coming to terms with this dark day of commemoration is to turn our gaze into the future. For the overwhelming majority of Germans, it is an irrefutable fact that Germany's eastern territories were lost forever in those May days of 1945. Hitler had gambled them away.

Moreover, the division of Germany was cemented for an unforeseeable time to come: This became clear at the latest by March 10, 1952, when Stalin's note was rejected. Hardly any German indulges in illusions about this

ET our friends must grasp the follow-ing: As a divided nation, we Germans suffer most of all from the heightened tension between East and West and from the sometimes almost tangible atmosphere of danger lurking along our frontier.

For this reason, the citizens of the Federal Republic and those of the German Democratic Republic do not see their task - 40 years after Hitler's downfall - in bold dreams about a reshaping of Europe in the near future. They are forced to pursue Utopias of a more practical nature. Can one lower the age limit for pensioners allowed to travel to the West? Is there any way of making it less expensive to visit relatives in the East? Can one mitigate the fears that the nuclear warheads in the Eastern and Western frontier areas may one day be fired?

In our opinion, only an unconditional recognition of the status quo creates the prerequisite for a gradual change in the status quo Anyone who wishes to end the division of Europe in the course of a long historic process must recognize the division of Europe however hrutal this may sound. To be precise, he must make this decision of Europe tolerable for the people who live here. These are our banal European views that have been drilled into us for 40 years.

TET me respectfully point out: We Germans have personal experience of the impact of a "policy of strength." Konrad Adenauer and John Foster Dulles were great men, yet their pledge of being able to achieve the remification of Germany by means of such a policy proved to be a flop. And what grounds are there for hoping that a "policy of strength" that clearly miscarried in the '50s can bring success in the '80s? For this reason, Europeans are skeptical when President Ronald Reagan invokes the cancellation of the provisions of Yalta and the liberation of the peoples of Eastern Eu-

We Germans have seen how our Allies simply watched with folded arms during a workers' uprising in East Berlin on June 17, 1953, and during the construction of the Berlin Wall in 1961. No doubt, they had to refrain from action because anything else might have brought on a world war and thus caused the irrevocable destruction of the old Continent. But we are all convinced that this would have been no different in 1985 than in 1961 or 1953, and that is why we distrust high-sounding language. Instead of indulging in theteric, we are struggling to make progress in a series of small steps — small steps toward disarmament, for example. Bearing all this in mind, we Social Democrais will avail ourselves of May 8, 1985, as the opportunity to press once more for concrete disarmament initiatives. We do not need a second Cold War, what we need is a second Ostpolitik.

Our message for May 8, 1985, is as follows: the Federal Republic must stay firmly anchored in the Western alliance, but as an insistent and sometimes difficult partner who repeatedly points out that the European truce must expand into a sound peace order.

Seizing a historical opportunity

By Alois Mertes

HEN Hitler came to power in 1933, I was 11 years old. In 1945 I was 23, and today I am 63. The experience of those 52 years has to be regarded as a whole. To this very day it has molded the political judgment of my generation. We can only speak adequately about May 8, 1945, and the German question if we bear in mind the origins and the course of the 12 years under Hitler's dictatorship, but also the consequences that the German people and its wartime enemies have since

A nation is a community of shared responsibility one should not try to escape from. However, the post-1945 allegation that the Germans bear a collective blame for what happened in the period of history is incompatible with Judeo-Christian morality and with the historical truth.

It is true that in 1933 some 80 percent of the German student community favored a totalitarian solution to the political and economic crisis besetting the country, which had never experienced a dictatorship. They want-ed Hitler's National Socialism or Stalin's Communism, but they wanted neither war nor Auschwitz, nor the Gulag Archipelago. They no longer believed in the ability of democracy to master the problems of the time and of their future. Hitler came to power by lawful means. Many believed his scapegoat agitation, especially the outrageous slogan: "It's all the fault of the Jews."

We should not forget, however, that in 1932-33 only a minority in many parts of the country followed Hitler's ideology and his party. In the electoral district of Bitburg, for instance, which I have represented in the German Bundestag since 1972, the National Socialists gained only 17.6 percent of the votes in the last free elections for the Reichstag held on Nov. 6, 1932, and the Communists only 5.7 percent, while the democratic parties together polled 76.3 percent.

From 1933 on, the Germans experienced an economic upswing that stabilized Hitler's position at home abroad. Out of desperation, opportunism and blindness, the Germans lost democracy and the rule of law. And from 1939 onward, by invading their neighbors, they lost peace as well. Hitler wanted war. Stalin encouraged him — until Germany's nefarious attack on the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941.

To us Germans, the May 8 meant not only the end of a bloody war and a totalitarian regime that had brought death, suffering and destruction to the whole of Europe and had sultied the name of Germany through systematic genocide. It meant not only the expulsion of millions of Germans from their homeland, not only the beginning of the subjugation of a part of Germany and Eastern Europe to totalitarian domination.

To my generation, May 8, 1945, meant in retrospect, first and foremost the beginning of a great historical opportunity that we have been using these past 40 years, an opportuni-ty to build a future of freedom and justice, of reconciliation and peace. Human rights and the renunciation of force were to become the factors governing German policy.

Kurt Schumacher, a Social Democrat who spent 12 years in a concentration camp, expressed our vow with the words: "Never again dictatorship in Germany, never again war emanating from German soil." The fact that at least we Germans in the free part of our country have been able to keep both parts of this vow is the great achievement we have been able to accomplish in the community of free nations and thanks

N this May 8th, Germans of my generation will reflect with gratitude and pride on these 40 years of peace and democracy. We want our children and our grandchildren to identify with their nation and defend the precious gifts of peace and freedom, which are inseparable.

We are not at all forgetting the crimes of the National Socialist dictatorship - including those against our own people. This ap-plies above all to the genocide against the Jews. But we Germans do not have to forget the good things that our people have given to

Where they have been able to participate in free elections, the Germans have opted for Western democracy because there is no longer a national German interest that can be detached from law and liberty. Thus we have accepted the moral obligation to defend, also in our international relations, our whole nation's claim to individual human rights and to national self-determination. This calls for political endurance and historical determination on the part of the Federal Republic of Germany, but also on the part of its principal allies. But Hitler's 1939 "recipe" - the threat and use of force, collusion with the Soviet Union at the expense of Poland and the West — has been banished completely and for all time from German foreign policy.

However, anyone who expects the free Germans to accept forever the present division of Germany into a zone of self-determination and a zone of foreign domination is taking an unrealistic view. He is discrediting Western democracy, which rests on the precedence of human rights. This kind of ahistorical "realism" would cast doubt upon the moral reliability of the West in Europe.

That is why I mention in conclusion one of the most significant facts of the past 40 years. The three Western powers have unequivocally abided by their rights and responsibilities that they — together with the Soviet Union — assumed for Berlin and Germany as a whole until such time as a peace treaty is concluded with Germany. Until then they will stay with us: legally as the victors of 1945, politically as guarantors of peace and of our freedom since 1945.

But they are at the same time trustees of the claim of all Germans to self-determination within the scope of a peaceful order in Europe that at the same time allows for the legitimate interests of our neighbors. Speaking in Berlin on November 27, 1984, Arthur F. Burns, the U.S. ambassador, said: "We regard our function here as being in effect, trustees of the German nation. We do not consider present divisions of this city as permanent. Until the day when both parts of Berlin and Germany are reunited in freedom, the presence of the Allies in Berlin provides the irreplaceable foundation for the well-being of this city." This is the German and Berlin question in

Market Offers Opportunity For Those Bearish on Dollar

By BOB HAGERTY

ONDON - As the dollar sourced anew last week, the Eurobond market offered plenty of paper for those who think the U.S. currency is due for a fall. "The recent drop in the dollar frightened people," said Willy Dunn, a director of Société Générale Strauss Turnbull Ltd., a London bond dealer. Despite the dollar's rebound, he said, "they're looking to put ever-increasing amounts in other currencies."

Fixed-income issues denominated in Australian dollars, European currency units, French francs and Deutsche marks attracted investors last week, while the lone straight dollar bond floun-

Yen is term, int'i inst. shocked from the currency's recent plunge to a low of 62 U.S. cents from 83 cents at the beginning of this year.
"Up to now, the Australian markets were only good for losing money," said a Swiss fund manager. "It was a real beating."

For a time, there was plenty to beat the currency down. In January, the government abandoned a target for moncy-supply growth that it could not manage to achieve. The idea may well have had its merits, but it was not the sort of move to soothe foreign investors. Then, in February, Prime Minister Bob Hawke decided to withdraw from MX missile tests with the United States, raising fears that he could not face down the left wing of his own Labor Party. But recent news has been more positive. Inflation, at about 5 percent, has not resurged as some feared, and the government last month promised to reduce spending, albeit without filling in many details about how it would do so.

Such reassuring news has helped the Australian dollar steady at about 65 cents. On the view that the currency probably is near the bottom of its current trading range, some analysts say that Australian dollar bonds, taken in small doses, appear attractive as a hedge against the U.S. dollar.

Yields on Australian-dollar bonds generally are two or three percentage points above those on U.S.-dollar issues. (The New Zealand dollar offers even giddier yields, but many investors consider that market too thin and speculative.)

HE latest Eurobond issue denominated in Australian dollars is last week's five-year, 13.25-percent issue from Commonwealth Bank of Australia, which carries a government guarantee. On Friday, the bonds were trading at about 98.5 bid, for a yield of 13.68 percent.

Other recent Australian-dollar Eurobonds were offering even higher yields, such as 14.15 percent for five-year Woolworths Ltd. bonds and 14.73 percent for a three-year Citicorp Australia issue. But there are drawbacks. The market remains small and thinly traded, appealing mostly to individual investors. Only a few banks.—notably Orion Royal Bank, Hambros Bank and Kredietbank — make markets in seasoned issues.

Moreover, analysts are cautious about prospects for the Australian economy. Inflation is expected to rise to 7 or 8 percent later this year, and sizable trade deficits are in prospect.

Mark Wood, an Australia watcher at the London stockbrokerage of Grieveson, Grant & Co., said the currency appears unlikely to fall below 60 cents. But he added: "I don't see great upside from that." David Sheridan of James Capel & Co. expects the Australian dollar to gain against the U.S. dollar this year but fall against the mark and yen.

While John Kerr, an associate director at Orion Royal, called the market attractive at present levels, he cautioned, "I wouldn't say you'd put widows' and orphans' last pennies into it."

Another currency enticing some bargain chasers is the French france. Last week's five-year, 11.5-percent issue for Automobiles Pengeot was quoted Friday at about 98.75 bid, to yield 11.85

Indonesia Economy Is Praised

But World Bank Criticizes Policies

By Peter Millership

JAKARTA - The World Bank in a confidential report, has praised Indonesia for remarkable economic improvements but criticized the government for inward-oriented rade policies that risked stunting the nation's growth.

The bank said in its annual review on Indonesia that the economy had achieved 6.5-percent growth last year, nearly 2 percent higher than the previous year, because of sound economic management and prudent borrowing.

At the end of 1984 most economic indicators looked remarkably bealthy, the bank said. Inflation was sharply down, agricultural growth was strong government savings grew, and Indonesia was awash with foreign-exchange re-

After lavish praise for these achievements, the bank, whose formal name is the International Bank for Reconstruction and Develop-ment, strongly criticized trade and industry policies.

The report warned that the economy, which relies on oil and gas for 70 percent of its foreign exchange, vas far too vulnerable.

It called on Indonesia, the world's fifth most populous country, to dismantle complex protectionist barriers. These could stunt the nation's growth and made it hard to switch the economy away from oil dependence, the bank said.

The report said growth in 1985 and 1986 would be lower than last year and probably less than 4 per-cent annually because of poor oil

The bank said oil was a narrow and vulnerable source of foreignexchange earnings. Indonesia, which belongs to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, produces about 1.4 milion barrels of oil a day and is the biggest liquefied natural gas exporter in the

Daimler-Benz Is Gearing Up for U.S.

German Goal: A Bigger Share In Truck Market

By Warren Brown Washington Post Service HAMPTON, Virginia — West

Germany's Daimler-Benz AG is assembling a new tool here in its campaign to get a bigger piece of the U.S. medium-truck market. It is the LPS 1525, a mediumduty, cab-over-engine, diesel-powered truck that drives with the ease of a manual transmis-

Daimler-Benz, better known in the United States for its Mercedes-Benz passenger cars, wants to use the 1525 to help boost its present 2.6-percent share of the domestic medium-truck market to about 7 percent by the end of the decade.

That gain would come at the expense of General Motors Corp., International Harvester Co. and Ford Motor Co., the U.S. companies that control about 90 percent of the domestic medium-truck market, Daimler-Benz officials said.

The remaining 10 percent of the U.S. medium-truck market is occupied by imports and a collection of foreign companies, such as Daimler-Benz, that have U.S. assembly bases.

"We can get paranoid about what the 10 percent is doing, or we can go after the larger group," said Peter E. Rupp. "We have to eat into the local manufacturers' market." Mr. Rupp is president and chief executive officer of Freightliner Corp., based in Portland, Oregon, and its Hamp-ton-based subsidiary, Mercedes-Benz Truck Co.

U.S. Economy Mixed in April, Purchasers Say

turned mixed in April, the National Association of Purchasing Management said Sunday. But despite signs of a slowing pressed renewed confidence in the economic ontlook, the Conference Board said in another report. In their latest monthly survey, the purchasing managers' group said new orders — which are an indicator of future production rose in the latest monthly survey to their highest level since last June. In addition, production main-tained the healthy pace of March,

In contrast, inventory and em-ployment levels showed no change from their low levels in March, the

A lingering negative sign is that the purchasing managers' compos-ite index fell in April for the third consecutive month, it said. Also confirming the economy's lack of strength were an improvement in vendor deliveries, no items being in short supply and the ap-parent inability of companies to increase prices, it added. "The April improvement in new orders is noteworthy but it is overshadowed by a major concern, namely, the continued decline in the purchasing managers' compos-ite index," said Robert J. Bretz, director of corporate purchasing for Pitney Bowes Inc. and chairman of the group's business survey Thirty-two percent of the group's members reported that new orders were better in April, up from 26 percent the previous month.

NEW YORK — After slowing indicated production was higher in for two months, the U.S. economy April, up from 27 percent in March and the highest since June, when 35

> The seasonally adjusted composite index fell to 47.3 percent in April from 47.7 percent in March. That was the lowest level since January 1983 when the index fell to 46.9 percent. A reading below 50 percent indicates that the economy is in a declining phase.

However, the increase was offset somewhat by the 17 percent reportpercent in March.

The speed at which vendors delivered their products improved in April, with more than twice as many purchasers — 13 percent — reporting faster than slower delivery. That indicates vendors have plenty of excess production capaci-

Also, twice the number of purchasing managers, 14 percent, re-ported paying lower prices in April than those who reported paying higher prices. That made April the fifth consecutive month that more purchasers reported lower prices than higher prices.

Numerous members reported the inability of their own company to raise prices, suggesting a squeeze on corporate profits in the months shead, the group said.

The group's report is based on data compiled from surveys of purchasing managers at 250 industrial Separately, the Conference Board, a business-sponsored re-search group, said its measure of business confidence advanced to 61 in the first quarter of this year, up from 57 in the fourth quarter of 1984. The measure had declined consistently through 1984 after peaking at 76 in the second quarter of 1983.

The measure is based on survey responses from 1,500 chief executive officers.

Despite the upturn in overall confidence, only a third of the surveyed executives said they expected their own industry's employment totals to rise this year. A year ago, 50 percent had projected job growth in their industries.

"The latest survey results suggest a mixed U.S. business climate, said Kenneth Goldstein, an economist for the board.

"The rise in overall confidence. coupled with a decline in labormarket expectations, indicates that business leaders are reasonably confident they can meet current production and sales targets but are concerned about the pace of economic activity ahead."

WHAT A STUNNING image from con-temporary South Africa: "There are, in Johannesburg," the journalist James North writes in "Freedom Rising," "a couple of curi-ous cases of genuine multiracialism. Both are giant-scale public chess games... At each place, blacks and whites regularly play each other, trundling the enormous pieces around the board, while a mixed crowd of onlookers the board, while a mixed crowd of officients eagerly discusses the progress of the game. Nowhere else in the city can you see sights like a middle-aged white man nodding thoughfully as a young black man in jeans expounds on the pitfalls of a certain defensive strategy."

Vincent Crapanzano's "Waiting" hasn't a scene to match this, but it is without doubt the finest and most valuable work on the Southern African predicament yet written.

How these books differ, when superficially they appear to have a good deal in common, has its own significance. The writers are both American, both have a passionate abhorrence of apartheid, and both elected to spend a considerable time on research that encompassed not only the immediate but much his-torical and other background material.

In "Waiting," Crapanzano, an anthropolo-gist, set himself to studying the effects of domi-nation on those who dominate by living in a small village near Cape Town and overtly col-lecting material from his subjects, the white population. Ideally, he says, he should have worked with both the dominating and the dominated, but this was legally precluded and

"had I spent too much time with nonwhites, I could have endangered their lives." North made a "clandestine" journey lasting over four years, told whites he was a geogra-pher, associated with blacks and took to risk ing life, as Studs Terkel puts it in a jacket blurb, by carrying out errands for political activists. Not that he himself seems to have ever been in any mortal danger, given the evidence plus the degree of immunity afforded

Then each man sat down and wrote: one in grave, measured tones, the other with unbridled indignation.

"This book is fact," North asserts in his preface, But before long, the emotionally loaded adjectives — "weasel agents" and so on — seem as manipulative as they are unnecessary. Inconsistencies, misspelled Afrikaans, patently specious reasoning and wholly alien Americanisms in reported speech don't bolster confidence; neither do punches pulled during interviews characterized by ingraining behavior. Above all, a suspicion begins to grow that the writer is prone to believe anything he hears. writer is prone to believe anything he hears, provided it fits his thesis. "Another outstanding PAC leader." North writes, "Zephania Mothopens, was at one stage tortured so badly with electric shocks that when he reached for a metal cup in his cell afterwards sparks leapt from his fingers."

Firm editing would have made an enormous difference, for "Freedom Rising" contains many passages worth reading. The section on domestic servants, for example, is superbly done, and North has a fine reporter's eye for the telling picture. But even at its best, this book can only fuel the outrage felt by those opposed to apartheid; it takes a very different sort of book to deepen our understanding of Southern Africa.

And a very different sort of writer, too, one like Vincent Crapanzano, who can say, "I learned that it is possible to have a certain sympathy even for people whose values one finds reprehensible."

This is undoubtedly part of what makes "Waiting" such a singular book. Gone are the predictable streetypes, the stale generalizations that one depth a people their purposity. tions that can deny a people their humanity. Instead, come these voices:

"What tempers the idea of black violence," says the wife of an Afrikaner minister, "is the guilt I think one feels. One almost feels it would be just retribution."

"What angers me," says another Afrikaner, "is that you see in me your own underbelly. And Crapanzano admits this could be partially true of that "happily distant land," which "Waiting" often brings too close for comfort. In the next breath be provides a sharp reminder that here is a society so alien nothing should be presumed on the basis of life else Gradually, as the whites of the village Wyndal emerge as vividly as characters in a wellcrafted novel, statements like that gain painful darity.

"I didn't fight with anybody." It was Cordero's third Derby triumph (he won aboard Cannonade in 1974 and Bold Forbes in 1976).

But when he saw no competition for the lead, he angled Spend A Buck to the rail and was clearly in front after a quarter mile in a slow 23 seconds. The 111th Kentucky Derby was essentially over.

Don MacBeth, on the 6-to-5 favorite Chief's Crown, had envisioned sitting comfortably behind a duel of the two speed horses, but now he knew he had to chase the front-runner.

But Chief's Crown doesn't have that kind of raw speed. Not many horses do. Spend A Buck ran away from him, reaching the half-mile mark in 45-4/5 seconds and with a six-length advantage. All MacBeth could do was sit in second place and hope the leader would collapse. Spend A Buck continued to ac-

Come as You Are

By William Safire

"reminder that you are expect-Aed" card came in the other day, which struck me as a more sensible memory-jogger than a re-peat of the original engraved invi-tation with a "To Remind" written in the corner. The time, date and place were briskly and neatly laid terious instruction about dress: "Not Black Tie."

What is that supposed to mean? Perhaps it is a way of saying. "I know that you, a traditionalist, always wear black the to the opera, but just this once the rest of us are dressing like slobs and I'm telling you this so you won't feel out of Profound motives aside, does not black tie mean business suit, which is what it says on the Turkish Embassy's invitation to a reception? Taking it a step further, does that mean today's American Uniform (blue blazer, beige pants) is out? Does not black tie mean "any old tie," or even "no tie at all"? Indeed, does formal mean black tie or white tie? Does informal on an invitation mean that no ties are permitted? Does casual mean shoeless, bare midriff and gold chains? The language of engraved invitations, once a bastion of tradition, seems to be slipping its moorings, and the yacht is drifting out to sea.

For guidance, I have turned to Judith Martin, foremost living ex-pert on etiquette, author of "Miss Manners' Guide to Excruciatingly Correct Behavior" and "Miss Manners' Guide to Rearing Perfect Children." I knew Miss Manners back when she was a feature writer named Judy. These days, Miss Manners and I have a lock on both ends of the correctness dodge; thanks to a tradition known as "columnists" courtesy," I can call on her to find an alibi for my gaffes and blunders on the cocktail circuit and she can get me to justify her errors in English.

"The term informal changes its meaning," says Miss Manners, "depending on the particular age, geographical location and set of people using the word. We now live in a time of chaos." (C'mon, Judy, help the people.) "Guests who really care to know what the invitation means have learned to question closely. The best definition of informal I've heard recently came from Meg Greenfield, the editorialist. when I asked about an 'informal' party she was giving. She told me, Wear something that no one will remember the next day. What is formal? Miss Manners explains: "At one time, formal meant 'white tie'; a gentleman wore out, and then, in the corner, a mys- a tailcoat, a stiff shirt, a white waistcoat, and literally a white tie for a formal evening. At that time, > nowadays, black the is used to denote formal, but not white tie." Turning to the dictionaries, I find that formal meant white tie until the 1930s. In the '30s, black tie became dominant in men's evening fashion, and in the early 1950s. white tie was coined to mean "espe-cially formal, specifically, tails."

informal meant 'black tie' - but

Tuxedo, a dark suit with satin lapels and matching trousers, worn with a black tie and fancy shirt, was named after a country club near Tuxedo Lake, New York. (Tuxedo was a Lenape Indian word that has been translated as "He has a round foot," denoting a wolf; etymology goes deeper than etiquette.) The term is rarely used these days; dinner jacket is preferred, which can be white in summer or some other color worn with a black tie or a bow tie of a different color. An alternative to a waistcoat is a cummerbund. from the Hindi kamarband, a "loin band" that became a sash worn round the waist. In my set, formal means black tie, and white tie must be specified if a tailcoat is desired. Business attire means any kind of suit and tie. Informal means "not black tie." which in turn means "dark suit in the evening," and is the way most people now think is proper to go to the opera. Watch out for informal though — it slops over in meaning to casual, which means "no tie needed." I think very casual, in my peer group, is the equivalent of semiformal in a younger set, but suspect that semiformal may mean jacket and shoes, no tie but no T-shirt" to most teen-agers. "The only term I really despise is semiformal," says Miss Manners. "It is a despicable term that deserves to be eliminated. Sounds like the pants are not to match the jack-

A Funeral With Humor: Japanese Director Breaks Taboos

By Christine Chapman OKYO - "I look at a funeral with Thumor. That was my first intention, said Juzo Itami, director of the 1985 Japan Academy Award-winning film Ososhiki" (The Funeral).

Japan has left behind old values to accomplish economic success. We live in a consumer-oriented society, but some things don't change," Itami said: "At death the old values grab you."

"Ososhiki," a witty realistic comedy, reveals a modern middle-class family as it copes with a traditional funeral for an unpleasant old relative who dies suddenly after defying doctor's orders and in-dulging in rich foods; he drank too much sake, taunted his wife about wanting a young woman and, in comic justice, died on the very day of a successful medical Itami, 51, is an established actor and writer, but "Ososhiki" is his first directing venture. The movie, with its blunt title, considered taboo in the Japanese film business, has won several prizes. Even the government has approved it with the Ministry of Education's award for a movie by a new director. At the Academy Awards ceremony in February it won the five top prizes: for best picture, director, screenplay (by Itami), leading actor and supporting actress.

Although not entered in competition,
"Ososhiki" will be shown during Directors' Week at the Cannes Film Festival, which starts this week.

An independent production, the movie was distributed by the Arts Theater Guild to only a few theaters in November. Since its opening, "Ososhiki" has become a social phenomenon. Aimed at adult audiences, it is popular with all age groups. It has sparked offshoots including a how-to book on funerals, a funeral etiquette video recording, skits and parodies on television, and a book by Itami, "The Making of 'Ososhiki,' " which has sold 60,000 copies. Video sales of the film exceed 20,000 copies. The film is unusual for several reasons. First, it makes fun of a sacred rite in a country that rarely laughs at its tradi-tions. The funeral of the film is a threeday affair of hijinks and pseudo-solemnity, drunks and tearful women, bored children, banal conversation, some quick sex in the woods, much genuine emotion.

The film satirizes the national tendency to respect customs and conventions without understanding them or examining their pretentiousness. In one scene, a man and his wife, the dead man's daughter, sit rapt in front of a videotape on how to conduct a funeral, learning to repeat the standard phrases. The Japanese desire for correctness is a source of humor throughout.

Itami skewers pretension wherever he finds it: in an actor's self-conscious nervousness about making a speech at the funeral, at the hospital where four nurses bow to the widow and say, "Sorry, we, really didn't help you"; in the white shoes and dark glasses of a showbiz-type undertaker, at the priest's white Rolls-Royce. He also ribs the hypocrisy of Japanese respect for the aged in several scenes where the old folks are ignored or forgotten by their middle-aged children.

"Ososhiki" confronts Jananese society's emphasis on money matter-of-factly through the greed of the funeral business, and socially as the family tries to show a polite disregard for costs. They willingly pay the officiating priest 200,000 year (about $800) instead of 100,000 year because he flatters them about their status. (Husband and wife are television and film actors.) They casually withdraw 2 million yen from the bank to pay expenses and then, as custom requires, collect donations from the guests. But, in a brilliant scene, the wind blows the donated money away and everyone rushes to

The camera also points out such beguiling status symbols as the lovely country house where the funeral is held, fancy foreign cars, extravagant floral displays and rich black funeral costumes.

Itami's attitude toward Japan's "change of life in a consumer-oriented society," as he called it during an interview in his office, is realistic. "I rather enjoy it. This feeling is common among of surprises," he added.

"I made it from a real-life experience that took me by surprise and broke the image I had. Twisting the old, used images that people have acquired is a process of the imagination."

Two years ago, after Itami had decided to make a film, his father-in-law died. He and his wife, the actress Nobuko Miyamoto (who plays the daughter of the dead man), became responsible for the funeral arrangements. The documentary quality of the movie reflects Itami's keen observation of the events that followed.

"I was thrown into the film," he said. The feeling of using a funeral as the subject came to me at the garden of the crematorium as I was looking up at the smoke. It's a film sent from beaven to Itami cited a conversation from a William Saroyan story that he is translating. "Art is something you look at closely, even a cup, a pencil, a bowl," he recalled. 'Everybody sees those things,' says the son in the story. The father replies, 'Yes, but nobody looks at them carefully.' What I have done in making the film is watch attentively."

In the movie, the character Wabisuke fills the Itami role as son-in-law, but he is not like him, said the director. The confused Wabisuke must serve as chief mourner. Tsutomu Yamazaki plays him as a silent, serious man who does what he thinks necessary at the moment. Other characters may be modeled actors play seriously. It's an actor's does his wife plays the dead man's elder daughter, but their young son plays a grandchild. The widow is portrayed sympathetically as a loyal wife whose funeral speech is a moving moment. (Kin Sugai won the Academy Award for best supporting actress in the role.) Itami said his mother-in-law remains close to him and his wife, but he noted that his father-inlaw's elder brother, played as a self-ab-sorbed rich man, no longer sends them a

One film critic, Nick Bornoff in the Japan Times newspaper, wrote: "Itami takes 'Ososhiki' beyond the idiosyncracies of his own society to pinpoint the quirks and foibles of humanity at large."

New Year's card.

Itami credited good casting and his acting experience for the actors' seemingly natural reactions. He has played a variety of character parts since 1961, when he left the Daiei Production Company to free-lance. For his work in films he has won several awards — including last year's best supporting actor — for dramas such as "The Makioka Sisters" and the comedy "Family Game."

But he said that now he preferred directing to acting. As a director, he strives for low-key performances, or "understatement acting," as he described it.

"I'm an actor, basically," he said. "I also learned technique from watching the films of Yasujiro Ozu. In his films, actors don't overact. If the script is good, you can produce a funny film by making dream to make people laugh by being serious

Besides Ozu, who was famous for family drama, Itami cites among directors whose work he admires Luis Bunuel, Karl Dreyer, Alfred Hitchcock and Jean Renoir. Another is his father, Mansaku Itami, who was regarded as an important director during the silent-film era. Itami has seen few surviving films out of the 36 his father made. "Based on the realism of daily life, he used a mixture of genre as I do in 'Ososhiki,' " he said. In its cinematography, "Ososhiki" ex-cells in making vivid such details as the eating of a ripe avocado, the sensuous pouring of sake, or falling rain. It shifts point of view from one person to another, including the corpse as the family peers at it, and mixes cinematic forms such as a 60mm "home" movie, a videotape, a car-chase scene, a television commercial. The close attention to mood and detail gives

"Ososhiki" an emotional substance that satire often lacks. "I was very lucky in choosing an interesting subject for my first film," Itami said. "My films will always be humorous. In the next one I want to depict town scenes, which I couldn't show in 'Ososhiki," and food can be fun to watch. It can be erotic. My next film may be a ramen western," he added seriously. (Ra-
